Poker strategy is playing poker based on starting hands and based on the scope of the hand considering several factors. Most of the factors that govern poker strategy are mere statistics and calculations. Interestingly, these statistics are not just abstracts; the results of such mathematical approaches are very fruitful and result-oriented in winning than not most of the times. A well-defined and well played poker strategy can give good results 80% of the time.

Poker strategy involves understanding the best approach in dealing with a particular hand. A well-designed poker strategy gives a strong sense of intuition about other available kinds of approaches with a particular hand. It is important to understand that sometimes the best possible hands may perform less than another hand that you thought is not as better. Deciding on approaches like trying the alternative play for your existing hand can be made only with mathematical approaches and not otherwise.

Poker strategy aims in letting you decide on looking for a hand that will perform better in the overall play than just playing a hand that seems best at a particular moment. Poker strategy is aimed at the overall winning rather than stereo-typed approaches in playing a particular game.

Though intuition plays a major part in developing a poker strategy making use of intuition alone never helps. Correct intuition should be clubbed with mathematical and experimented results by several other players out there. You can device a lot of poker strategy ideas by watching players playing in casinos, online games and also in the major tournaments. You cannot Xerox play strategies, but you can get a clue of approaches by watching others playing.

Poker strategy does not mean that it should vary always. There are some best approaches that never go wrong or fail however and whenever you apply it. Some examples of such would be hands that need to be thrown in the pre-flop compulsorily in a particular variant. There are thoroughly experimented results of which hand should be played, which hand should not be played and which hand can be played as a hit or miss until the flop etcetera.

With increasing amount of information being made available in the internet about poker strategy with hand histories and tracker software, it should not be very difficult for us to device and learn poker strategy despite being a beginner. Figuring out a good poker strategy was challenging once upon a time, but not anymore. The poker world is a global village and there is a boom of information that can make you a pro very quickly.
